Medicine professor, Dr. Michael J. Gorman, says that the most likely cause of the problem is a genetic defect that causes the body to produce too much of a certain enzyme. This enzyme is called "phenylalanine hydroxylase" and it is responsible for breaking down the amino acid phenylalanine. If the body produces too much of this enzyme, it can lead to a buildup of phenylalanine in the blood and urine. This can cause a variety of symptoms, including intellectual disability, growth retardation, and skin problems. Dr. Gorman says that the condition is usually diagnosed through a blood test that measures the levels of phenylalanine. If the levels are high, it is a sign of the disease. Treatment usually involves a diet that is low in phenylalanine, which can help to keep the levels of the amino acid in the blood under control. Dr. Gorman says that with proper treatment, people with the condition can live normal lives.
